Everyone's Talking

Video haven: Creating videos for social media has grown extremely popular, perhaps nowhere more so than in Tulsi, a small Indian town in the state of Chhattisgarh. Out of the approximately 3,000 people living in Tulsi, about one-third are engaged in the business of creating & sharing their own videos. Jai Verma and Gyanendra Shukla, who were buddies, left their professions a few years ago to focus on making videos. They quickly found that their endeavors were profitable, and many of their neighbors chose to give it a shot as well. The village's video library includes content on music, education, DIY projects, and even unique dramas. Perhaps a local star will make it to the big screen one day.

Meme mark: Anybody with a stock photo subscription can download an image and use it for their own projects, such as adding context to a magazine article or using it to illustrate a notion in a commercial. However, a man from Molins de Rei, a town close to Barcelona, Spain, was shocked to learn that "the worst person you know" meme featured his face. Josep Maria Garcia's photograph ended up being used to accompany a satirical magazine article after he uploaded it to a photo website. Garcia chose to make jokes about it when he grew accustomed to the idea since he is aware of his goodness.

Salty wall: While it's not recommended by public health authorities, customers of The Mission restaurant in Scottsdale, Arizona (USA) occasionally lick the walls of the property. This is because the walls are composed of blocks of Himalayan salt. After visiting a Chicago restaurant that had a room filled with salt rocks, the restaurant's owner, Matt Carter, had the idea to construct pink salt walls. He says that unless it's to lick the salt block that comes with the tortillas, he doesn't encourage his patrons to stick out their tongues for a taste at his own restaurant. Alternatively, customers can purchase a tiny block of Himalayan salt to take home.

Phone recovered: As Owain Davis discovered, misplaced items can occur when sailing on the River Wye near Cinderford, Gloucestershire, England. Davis's phone vanished from his pocket while he and his fiancée were canoeing on the river, or so he believed. You can only imagine his amazement when he learned that his phone had been found ten months later. A friend informed him after seeing a post on social media. It was discovered in the dirt by a man named Miguel Pacheco, who dried it off and charged it. When Pacheco posted pictures of the recovered phone on social media, the comments he received directed him to Davis.

Watery mirror: In an effort to draw tourists, the people of Mitoyo, a city on Shikoku Island in Japan, organized a photo contest in 2016. One of the submitted images, taken at Chichibugahama Beach, was so stunning that the city used it as a marketing tactic. The photograph featured vibrant sky and clouds, a coastline, and individuals that appeared as two separate images—one reflecting in the serene, clear sea, and the other being the actual scene. The city's website offers advice on taking pictures at the site as well as details on the best times to visit. Today, many people visit the formerly undiscovered beach to take in its splendor.

FEATURED STORY:
“ UNCHAINED MELODIES”

In the heart of a bustling city, a young man named Elias lived in a small apartment overlooking a park. Elias was a prodigious pianist, having won numerous competitions since his childhood. His fingers danced on the keys with a grace that left audiences spellbound. Despite his talent, Elias lived a modest life, teaching piano to children and performing at local events.

Every morning, Elias practiced diligently, his music weaving through the walls of his apartment and spilling into the park below. Passersby would often pause to listen, captivated by the melodies. However, despite the admiration of those around him, Elias felt a weight pressing down on his soul, an invisible chain holding him back from pursuing greater opportunities.

Elias's deepest fear was failure. The thought of stepping onto a grand stage and making a mistake paralyzed him. He remembered his father's words vividly, "Elias, perfection is the only path to greatness." His father, a stern and exacting man, had pushed him relentlessly, and while Elias had honed his skill to near perfection, he had also developed an overwhelming fear of falling short.

One sunny afternoon, as Elias played a hauntingly beautiful piece, a knock on his door interrupted him. It was Clara, a renowned violinist who had recently moved to the city. She had heard his music while walking in the park and was eager to collaborate.

"Elias, your music is incredible," Clara said with a warm smile. "I would be honored to perform with you."

Elias felt a surge of panic. Performing with Clara meant stepping out of his comfort zone, exposing himself to a wider audience. He hesitated, but Clara's enthusiasm was infectious. After much coaxing, he agreed to join her for a small recital at a local theater.

As the day of the recital approached, Elias's anxiety grew. He practiced relentlessly, his fear gnawing at him. On the night of the performance, as he stood backstage, his hands trembled. Clara noticed his distress and gently placed a hand on his shoulder.

"Elias, remember why you play," she whispered. "It's not about perfection; it's about the emotion, the connection. Let the music flow through you."

Taking a deep breath, Elias stepped onto the stage. The lights were blinding, the audience a sea of faces. He sat at the piano, his heart pounding. As Clara began to play, Elias closed his eyes, letting the music guide him. Slowly, his fingers found their rhythm, and the fear that had gripped him began to fade.

The performance was transcendent. Elias poured his heart into every note, and for the first time in years, he felt truly free. When the final note resonated through the theater, the audience erupted in applause. Elias looked at Clara, her eyes shining with pride, and he realized that he had faced his deepest fear and emerged victorious.

From that night on, Elias's life changed. He began to embrace new opportunities, performing on grand stages and collaborating with renowned musicians. His fear of failure never fully disappeared, but he learned to channel it into his music, using it to fuel his passion rather than hold him back.

Elias's journey was a testament to the power of confronting one's fears. Through his music, he discovered not only his true potential but also the joy of sharing his gift with the world. And in doing so, he transformed his life, one beautiful note at a time.

Did You Know?

Magical place: Parque Francisco Alvarado in Zarcero, Costa Rica, is quite a sight. That's because gardener and artist Evangelisto Blanco shapes hedges and shrubs into all manner of magical and abstract figures, such as animals, people, and archways.

Sweet heat: The datil pepper is grown near St. Augustine, Florida (U.S.). It is quite hot, like a habanero, with a sweet, fruity flavor. Cooks like to use these peppers in hot sauces, pickles, and mustards.

Upright duck: A certain breed of duck actually looks more like a penguin. The Indian Runner duck's posture is upright. Rather than waddling, they can run, but they cannot fly. They are raised mostly for their egg production.

Safest shelter: If a tornado is coming your way, the best place to shelter is in a basement or on the lowest level of the house or building. Choose a room without windows, such as a bathroom.
